We describe the fabrication of all-silicon integrated optical temperature sensors for applications in optical transmission lines based on the wavelength dependence of the propagation constant of silicon microwires. Our microstructures are based on optical thin films of silicon nitride, on top of which microwires of graded refractive index are grown. To fabricate such structures, the etch sequence is optimized with respect to the optical properties of the dielectric stack, in order to obtain an efficient transfer of the guided modes into the microwires. Furthermore, the design and the fabrication of a transmitter and a receiver module based on the proposed microstructures are discussed. The invention relates to a locking device for valves, particularly for diesel pressure equipment with a hydraulic servo control, with a locking unit which has a rod and which is secured to a housing, with an electromagnetically actuatable solenoid valve which is intended to be actuated by way of the rod and which has a valve body which can be driven by the rod by way of a valve spring and which has a valve opening, with a valve carrier which can be actuated by way of the rod, with the valve carrier being movable by way of an actuating unit and with the actuating unit being mounted on the housing, with the actuating unit having an electromagnet and a mass and
